Unit 9 Writing

By setting up camping exclusion areas, many areas are restricted. These regional restrictions can have two consequences. The first is that most of the areas are set up as restricted camping zones, leaving all remaining areas on the private residential side. It is obvious that the increase in crime and the environment of private residential areas will be bad if many homeless people move to private residential areas because many conflicts are expected between the general people and the homeless. It could be that the crime rate will naturally rise if there are many conflicts between the two sides. The second is that many homeless people will reject the law and just live in their camps. This means that they will all continue to live in no-camping areas because the increase in the number of no-camping areas has left homeless people nowhere to go. It is also expected that many homeless people will be arrested or detained if they refuse the city's decision. As a result, many homeless people will be detained, and the city will be spending a lot of taxes. In my opinion, setting up a camp restriction zone will damage both the homeless and the citizens.
